Here are some step-by-step instructions to help you clean your machine. [Guidelines for the prevention of varicella in children]. Vaccination against varicella is the best way to prevent this disease in childhood. The annual incidence of varicella is 10 per 1,000 children aged 1-14 years. The disease is more severe in young children and the morbidity is high in adults and, among adults, it is higher in immunocompromised patients. Complications include pneumonia and encephalitis. Varicella infection can be transmitted from an asymptomatic individual during the incubation period (usually two days) and before the appearance of the rash, during the prodromal period. The most frequent complications are the cutaneous, of which the most severe is chickenpox. Secondary transmission of infection can occur through direct contact with infected individuals (approximately five cases per week per 1,000,000 children) or contact with fomites (more than 50 cases per 100,000 people per week). Varicella infection is included in the national immunization program in Mexico. The implementation of this initiative has reduced the incidence of varicella, particularly among children aged 0-4 years and immunocompetent patients. These guidelines are based on the scientific evidence and on the results of a systematic search of the literature. The recommendation is that all healthy children between 12 and 24 months old should be vaccinated with the live attenuated varicella-zoster virus vaccine. The vaccination should be performed at least one month before the start of varicella epidemics in order to achieve a sufficient level of protection.
